

President Joseph R. Biden
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20500

June 30, 2022

Mr. President:

In just over 60 days, tens of millions of student loan borrowers are slated to be thrown back into repayment on federal student loans. Recent reports indicate that the Biden Administration is considering a rushed restart of student loan repayment as part of a broader strategy to mitigate historic levels of inflation.¹ We, the undersigned 176 organizations, are writing to strongly urge your administration not to threaten the financial security of people with student debt as a tactic to fight inflation. Instead our organizations urge you to enact robust student debt cancellation that is not means tested and does not require an opt-in for participation and to fully implement this policy before any student loan bill comes due.

People with student debt cannot be required to make payments toward loans your administration has promised to cancel.

Our organizations enthusiastically support broad cancellation of student debt because it would provide desperately needed relief for millions of people and, in the process, strengthen the economy and our nation. We also understand that at a time of extremely high inflation, when even the necessities are becoming out of reach for many families, student debt relief would ease the financial pressure that so many Americans are feeling.

A proposal to immediately restart student loan payments and make debt cancellation contingent on successfully navigating a bureaucratic process seems certain to undermine the Administration's relief efforts, and cause significant confusion for borrowers who can expect to have their debts cancelled. One recent report noted U.S. Department of Education officials' warned that requiring borrowers to apply for cancellation would significantly complicate and slow down cancellation, with experts predicting a "train wreck."² It would create substantial barriers for the millions of borrowers who have failed to benefit from every prior attempt by the Department to deliver debt relief to economically vulnerable people.³ Worse still, this proposal

Notably, higher education experts and economics say that cancellation is unlikely to significantly increase inflation.

may further widen the extraordinary disparate impacts student debt imposes on Black and Latino communities and women.⁴

For these reasons, our organizations strongly urge your administration to extend the pause on student loan payments as you work to implement a new policy of broadly cancelling a substantial amount of federal student loan debt for all borrowers.

Sincerely,
